

Complex health challenges continue to hamper the development of economies and nations. AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria alone cause six million deaths every year. Approximately 40% of the world's population is at risk of contracting malaria. Maternal and infant mortality rates remain unacceptable in most developing nations. Many of the diseases and conditions are preventable and treatable, yet they continue to spread throughout the world, especially in Africa.

The Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) brought about ambitious disease control and mortality reduction objectives, but without dedicated and trained human resources, infrastructure and equitable access to services most developing countries will fail to meet those goals. Managing and controlling communicable and non-communicable diseases, developing and retaining human resources and designing health systems to be more equitable and accessible are critical components in poverty reduction strategies and are on the forefront of the international public health agenda.

We consider innovative strategies, sustainable financing, public-private partnerships and synergies essential elements of the national and donor strategies in achieving the health related MDGs.
